ARTIFICIAL BREEDING OF TERRAPIN Terrapin is one of the luxuries of the table in this city; yet few person are aware of the difliculty of getting a full supply in order to satisfy the demand of the market. Those who ways be obtained for every one that you be catch terrapin have to hunt for them as far raised. south as Galveston, Texas, although Savannah Ga., and Charleston, S. C., furnish supplies. Some very fine terrapin are caught in the Chesapeake Bay; but very few of them come to this market, as they are eagerly purchased at Baltimore, where they have been sold as high as $45 per dozen. In order to get anything like a supply for the New York market a leading wholesale fish dealer found it necessary, several years ago, to lay in a stock during the Summer, at which time, in consequence of their veracity, the terrapin are more easily eaught, than to waite for Winter when they lie dormant in the mud and sand at the bottom of the water, and consequently are not so easily found. As it was necessary to preserve the terrapin alive, he caused a large pen to be constructed on the shore of Pleasure Bay, near Long Branch. This pen is about 100 feet square, constructed with a fence of planking 8 inches wide, 24 inches thick, and of ordinary length. These planks were driven down into the sand and mud so as to leave two-thirds of the inclosure under water, with about 8 feet of water at the deepest part. The bottom and shore was artificially constructed so as to give it a gradual slope, and the shore was made of white sea sands, while the bed of the pen was composed of ordinary sea sand and mud. Here for three or four years past the fish dealer stored his terrapin, sometimes having as many as 10,000 terrapin in the pen at one time. The narrow spaces between the planks cliowed the water always to be in a proper condition for the preservation of the life of shell fish. About two years ago the proprietor of the pen no-

two years ago the proprietor of the pen notied that the terrepins were in the habit of laying their eggs in the white sand on the shore of the pen; but such was the nature of the place that the eggs were continually being destroyed through one terrapin digging up the stroyed through one terrapin digging up the eggs laid by another and from other causes. Is a faultless family medicine, It, while digging a hole to lay its own eggs, one terrapin came upon those of another, it would be almost certain to break the shell, and then the contents would be eaten, so rapacious are they. Again, at the very high tides the water of the bay would cover the whole bed and shore of the inclosure, and the eggs would also be destroyed in that manner, as they will not hatch after having been soaked with water. The few that were hatched out from among the several thousand eggs that had been laid by the terrapin were almost instantly destroyed by the older and larger animals, immediately upon the young terrapin's attempting to reach the water; consequently nothing resulted from the laying of the eggs, and the raised expectations of the proprietor of the pen were blighted. He had observed, however, a fact which afterwards became useful, namely, that after depositing the eggs the parent terrapin cared nothing more for them, leaving the process of hatching to be done by the warmth of the earth and the sun; and the idea was suggested that, with proper attention and observation, an artificial breeding place for terrapin might be constructed, and be attended with success. Watching the terrapin while they were laying eggs, he ascertained that if the ergs were laid too near the surface of the sand, the heat of the sun would dry them up, and render them entirely lifeless. The terrapin with its hind feet, generally digs a hole nearly as deep as its body is long, and having deposited the egg, fills up the hole again. When the egg is hatched the young terrapin scratches its way out to the surface, and then seeks the water. In order, therefore, to make the artificial breeding successful, these eggs had first to be preserved from injury. The enterprising proprietor therefore constructed, about a year ago, a second pen on the same plan as the one described, but further inland and on marshy ground. This pen is about 40 feet square, and has a sluice or ditch which allows the water of the bay to run in and out, and yet always leaves a depth of six feet of water in the inclosure at the deepest part. This pen was also constructed with a shelving bed and shore, and one-third of the inclosure was so arranged that it consisted of dry sea sand. The sandy shore of the larger pen was then taked daily, and the eggs were taken from the hiding places. With as little delay as possible these ergs were transferred to the second pen, and then planted in regular rows to about the depth of the length of a full sized terrapin's body. When the Tribune reporter visited this breeding pen, the shore resembled a sandy garden spot in which a gardner had been planting bulls or seeds, and had marked the spots with little sticks. At this time there were about 5 000 eggs which had been planted, and the proprietor was very anxious to see the results of his experiment. At about the beginning of September his enterprise gave to kens of success, for late one evening he was aroused by an attendant, who informed him that the eggs had begun to hatch out. With a lantern he visited the place, and there saw that the young terrapin had taken to the water where they could remain undisturbed, as no young terrapin appeared to be healthy, and as other eggs were subsequently hatched out, each day added to their number. The pro-

Prictor has endeavored to make proper provision for the protection of the young terrapin during the winter, and if they safely pass through it, a new source of production will have been discovered that may make in time this harbor a point of terrapin supply instead of terrapin consumption. It has been estimated by several persons that a terrapin requires about ten years in which to mature; but the proprietor of the artificial breeding pens believes that he will be com-Pensated for his labors much sooner. As he Intends next year to adopt the same course as during the past summer, in order to prevent hext summer's hatching from being destroyed by that of this summer, another inland pen is to be constructed, on the shore of which will be planted as many eggs as can be obtained. The size of this third pen will greatly depend on ic success attending the work of the past Summer. The prospect of an immediate return for the outlay is very remote indeed; but if the en-compelled to hunt for them as far away as l'exas. The larger terrapin pen presented a very curious spectacie at the time of the reperter's visit. Summer is the feeding time of the terrapin, and they are generally very voracious, Fish, clams and crabs were some had to them as food, and the throwing of a single crab of clam on to the shere near the z. t. r was enough to being two or three hundred of the greatures out upon the shore. Moving the hard two or three times through the warm racht at least a hundred breaks to the surface -This arose from the fact that troy had become quite used to the tank of being fed; consequently links treated was existrienced in catching some of these cut u-looking creatures. As the find they notes: mest te enjoy can be had every by the Vicinity the cost of maintaining the near has been and will still be comparatively small; while the revenne, should the scheme there even made a ately successful, will be very an all as no delay terrapin will easily bring in the
